Market Review

The Australian listed real estate market lost ground slightly in the March quarter, underperforming the broader Australian share market. The S&P/ASX 200 A-REIT index finished down by 0.47%, on a total return basis. The REIT market was particularly challenged earlier in the period, as optimism about further economic stimulus in the US and robust Australian economic data set a bullish tone, dampening the more defensive listed real estate market. The market also came under pressure as the yield curve steepened, with long-term interest rates following US 10-year Treasury yields higher whereas short-term rates were largely unmoved, as well as being impacted by a global trend of investors switching their portfolios to take advantage of improving economic conditions. Growth companies that reported strong results during the earnings season were generally sold down in favour of value companies. At the sector level, investor interest in the office space was spurred later in the period by the rollout of vaccines, albeit it was disappointingly slow. Elsewhere, the industrial segment continued to benefit from long-term secular growth trends such as e-commerce, data connectivity and retail supply chain logistics, while residential continues to go from strength to strength.

Outlook

Australian listed real estate will likely continue to be subject to near-term volatility, which is affecting all markets, due to rising bond yields. Despite this, listed real estate dividend yields are still attractive compared to bond yields, and prices are significantly discounted to broader industrial shares. Industrial real estate is expected to remain robust as it is favourably exposed to long-term secular growth trends such as e-commerce, data connectivity and retail supply-chain logistics. Office real estate sentiment should improve as COVID-19 vaccines are rolled-out and the return to office working accelerates, however there remains some concern about the medium-term demand for office space given the remote working experiment of the past year. Residential real estate, particularly Sydney and Melbourne house prices, are expected to continue to increase over the medium term, and whilst apartment prices have lagged, they are also expected to accelerate in 2021. Retail real estate is expected to be mixed, with malls facing long-term structural challenges wrought by e-commerce, whilst large-format retail is likely to benefit from residential price increases.
