Market Review

The economic backdrop became more complicated as the quarter progressed. Uncertainty over the persistency of inflationary pressures, ongoing stimulus packages, more hawkish than expected US Federal Reserve communications, and stretched valuations in many areas, all resulted in a more heterogeneous market interpretation of future economic direction and an increasingly fluid risk on/ risk off bias. In addition, there remain some unresolved global supply-demand mismatches. The G7 meeting in Cornwall concluded with communications regarding the equalisation of global taxes but there is long way to go before anything concrete can be agreed on an international basis. The meeting also laid bare the West's increasingly fractious relationship with China. However, this year's summit was generally considered to be more positive than recent ones under the Trump administration, which should augur well for increased global cohesion, especially amongst developed democracies. Strong US demand is coming up against some supply-demand mismatches and bottlenecks which are also boosting market fears of inflation. However, the US Federal Reserve is playing down inflationary risks, citing they are transitory, which is currently assuaging markets. Despite this, investors will be watching how the combined effect of ongoing stimulus programmes, married to disrupted and possible structural changes to some supply chains, may ultimately impact the longer-term inflationary environment.
