Market Review

The December quarter saw continued choppy conditions across many markets, similar to that experienced throughout the rest of 2022. While driven by familiar themes, broader market sentiment was pulled in contrary directions, perhaps due to differing timeframes of investor outlooks, as shorter-term traders unsurprisingly continued to focus on inflation prints and the pathway of rate rises, medium-term considerations tended to centre around the growing likelihood of recession, while many longer-term investors looked beyond impending recessionary conditions to what opportunities a post-downturn recovery in economic growth, along with potentially lower inflation, may bring. Around the globe, central bankers' comments remained generally hawkish, even towards the end of the quarter, despite a clear slowing in the pace of hikes. Amid all this, continued geopolitical and diplomatic developments added complexity to the broader global outlook, with Russia's war on Ukraine and Chinese government policy both remaining in the spotlight. In the meantime, the US unveiled its next generation stealth bomber, the B21, arguably adding significant weight to NATO's strategic and tactical deterrence. Elsewhere, long-standing political tensions continued to simmer between Greece and Turkey. Finally, China suddenly began its exit from its draconian 'COVID-zero' policy, injecting a shot of optimism into the global outlook, particularly in Asian emerging markets.
